WHAT IS ALL IN?

All In is a free program that supports early childhood educators, families and communities to build childrens' understanding of respect, equality and inclusion from the early years.

Through practical learning experiences, All In shows how play, language and storytelling can shape the way children see themselves and others.

Why does it matter?

We believe in a world where all children build healthy, respectful relationships and grow up free from violence.

But gender stereotypes can box children in, shaping beliefs and behaviours that can lead to disrespect and, over time, gender-based violence.

All In supports the adults in children's lives to challenge these stereotypes early, and model safe, respectful relationships every day.

Because preventing harm starts in the early years – and everyone has a role to play.

WHAT YOU'LL GAIN:

All In builds confidence and skills to put respect and equality into everyday practice.

You'll learn how to...

Create inclusive environments that reflect diverse identities and experiences

Embed First Nations perspectives and ways of knowing in meaningful, respectful ways

Support children to develop a strong sense of belonging and fairness

Model respectful relationships and respond to everyday moments with intention

Challenge limiting gender stereotypes as they show up in play, language and behaviour

GROUNDING IN COMMUNITY,

LED BY EVIDENCE.

All In was co-created with First Nations women, early childhood educators and primary prevention practitioners.

It foregrounds First Nations knowledge and cultural practices, ensuring the program stays connected to community priorities and ways of knowing.

Aligned with the Early Years Learning Framework, All In brings together proven approaches to help influential adults foster environments where respect, equality and safety are part of everyday learning.
